Despite being limited to type with one hand, he was back at the keyboard by Tuesday morning.

The accident happened when the journalist attempted to take a picture of a moving float. As he was running backwards, he fell and shattered his wrist.

He may have tripped while running backwards by hitting a reflector in the middle of U.S highway 19.

The photographer saw his arm was severely injured. He first went to his wife to say that he believed his wrist was broken. She began packing their chairs into the car.

Feeling vey woozy, the injured man went to Chiefland Police Officer Kyle Scholz for help. The officer radioed for an ambulance.

The ambulance arrived within eight minutes and took the journalist to an emergency room within 45 minutes, where ER staff determined he needed emergency surgery.

He was then taken by ambulance to North Florida Medical Center, where Dr. Jason

Thomas Shinn, an orthopedic surgeon performed emergency surgery.

Some screws and other hardware were added to repair the three broken bone part that had shattered when his arm hit the asphalt. The writer was admitted and slept two nights there.

The journalist returned to the Code Orange Office and restarted working again Tuesday morning.

The journalists said he plans to continue working at the same level as always, although he concedes that his typing has slowed and he is seeking help from people.

The injured man said he is thankful to God that he was not more seriously injured.

He's very thankful for all of the help given to him by Officer Schultz (and K-9 Blitz), the various paramedics, nurses and doctors, and others.
